Autism services may get tossed

Preschools axed? » Utah lawmakers consider cutting the $1.9M program.

By HEATHER MAY
The Salt Lake Tribune

Annie Campbell says a state-funded autism preschool changed her son's life. At age 6, Jackson can now speak in sentences, throws fewer temper tantrums and can handle eating in restaurants.

But the school, Giant Steps in Orem, could close at the end of the year or even earlier, along with three others in Salt Lake City, Ogden and rural Utah that collectively teach 200 children. The $1.9 million program — and others that help Utah's autistic children — have been targeted for cuts, as lawmakers try to slice $400 million from the state budget.

Barbara Lee of California during their trip to Capitol Hill in Washington, D.C., on Monday.

For this Utah family, the inauguration is loaded with history, emotion and pride.

When Barack Obama takes the oath of office today, Beverly King will be there, witnessing a historic step forward in the civil-rights movement she was so active in as a young woman.

Her son, Kirkland King, will be there, carrying the hope that Obama's presidency will give his daughters the role models they deserve by helping to brush aside negative black stereotypes of gangsters and money-obsessed rappers.

And his daughters — Kortney, 14, and Mackenzie, 11 — will be there too, watching the inauguration of not only the first black president, but of a person who, like
